

University Interior Design Lab

Market Focus: Education

The University Office of Design and Construction took a previous cafeteria and converted it into a space for the interior design students. The overall footprint of the space was an upgrade of square footage, but the furniture was dated and didn't reflect the profession the students were practicing. With the generous help of manufacturers' reps and the University, American Interiors was able to create a space that is much more conducive to learning.

Small spaces were created within the space allowing for ample amount of flexibility for the users. Included in the space was a private office, collaborative lounge, open benching stations with drafting tables, a meeting area for lecturing, a finish library with storage and workspace, and a kitchenette for students to pack their meals as they spend multiple hours per day in the space. Completion of the project led to many happy students who had a new studio to call home.

